

Marriage Finances

Contributed by Administrator

So you've decided to tie the knot! Have you discussed with your fiancé future financial matters? Will you combine your income, pay your own bills, or set savings goals? Have you considered how much debt may become yours as well as your partners? What about budgeting for children, vacations, and retirement. It's a lot to think about but with proper money management skills, you can lead a financially stable marriage.

MarriageFinances.com, strives to provide couples with the information and resources vital to long-term financial stability and freedom.

1. If you're not married yet, try discussing with your partner your financial goals. If you've already said, "I DO" it's never too late.
2. Obtain copies of your credit reports and review them together.
3. Determine if you want to add your names to each others credit cards, open a new joint account, or keep your accounts separate for now.
4. Set saving goals for the future.

These financial issues will shape how effectively your money will be managed throughout your marriage. Remember, financial health is not only determined by how much money you make. How you manage your income is vital to long term financial stability.

It is best to be open and honest about financial matters, that way you can deal with financial issues together as a couple and resolve the problem before any major damage is done!

Find more tips and advice on marriage finances at www.marriagefinances.com